

ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

I have accumulated many debts during the process of writing this thesis. Professor Deeptha Achar, my supervisor has taught me to see, analyze and argue texts more carefully. At every stage of my Ph.D. project, she helped me in framing my arguments. She has remained generous with her time and loan of books from her personal library. She discussed various drafts of this thesis even in the midst of her own more pressing professional commitments. She helped me in locating valuable books. Without her constant encouragement and guidance, this thesis would have been impossible. I thank her for all this.

I take this opportunity to acknowledge the role my teachers: Dr. J. V. Dave, G.T. Parsania and Rajan Barrett. It is their way of teaching literature which made me take literature seriously. My research owes much to their teaching and inspiration.

I express my gratitude to Shankar Painter, Neerav Patel, Harish Mangalam, Neerav Patel, Chandu Maheriya and Ratilal Rohit. They have remained generous with their time. Their significant inputs helped me to understand the Dalit literary movement. It is to their commitment to the Dalit cause that inspired me to undertake this thesis.

I wish to thank the Department of English, The M. S. University of Baroda and all the faculty and staff of the Department for the help, guidance and encouragement provided by them. I also wish to thank Prof. Sudha Pandya and Prof. M. F. Salat, both heads of the Department at various times for their help in every possible way. Most importantly, it was various seminars, workshops and conferences organized by the Department which allowed me to develop my own framework in a better way.

I would like to thank the participants, organizers and respondents of the “II National Students’ Conference on Literary and Cultural Studies” at Centre for Comparative Literature,

School of Humanities, University of Hyderabad; and “Travelling Genres: English in India, India in English” at Centre for English Studies, School of Language, Literature and Culture Studies, Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi.

I am grateful to the staff of the following libraries:

- College Library, Unjha
- The Hansa Mehta Library, The M. S. University of Baroda, Vadodara
- DRS Library, Dept. of English, The M. S. University of Baroda.

I wish to thank Anita Khade, Parth Dave and Dhiren Parmar at the DRS Programme, Department of English, The M. S. University of Baroda for their help and cooperation.

I am grateful to Amarendra Pandey, my friend at Gujarat Vidyapith, Sadra campus. I have gained much from discussions with him. Though he was working on his own research project, he read and discussed some sections of my early drafts and provided suggestions. The time spent with him at his place in Sadra had considerably aided me in completing this thesis in time. I also wish to record my thanks to Dr Vikram Singh Amarawat and Lajju Amarawat, both at Sadra for their love, friendship and hospitality. I also wish to thank Atul Parmar for providing me useful archival material related to Dalit movement in Gujarat.

I wish to thank Dr Santosh Dash, Dr Rajan Barrett, Dr Atul Parmar, Nitesh Chaudhary and Amarendra Pandey for proofreading different chapters of this thesis during the last stage. I am thankful to Katya and Manu for their warmth and hospitality.

I express my gratitude to Dr. Rakeshkumar Rao, the Principal, Shree B. P. Brahmabhatt and M. H. Guru Commerce College, Unjha for his encouragement and giving me freedom and space to organize a national seminar on “Dalit Literature: Social and Literary Perspectives.” I am also thankful to him for granting me crucial leaves whenever I required.

I am grateful to my colleagues in the department, Manisha Shah, Tejas Shah and Sonal Patel. They have always supported me and took care of my lectures and other works during my absence from the college.

I am thankful to my friends Bhagavanbhai Chaudhari, Amrut Jadav, Rajesh Makwana, Shivram Srimali and Harun Mansuri. Their interest and research in Dalit literature and their discussions have benefited me.

I am thankful to my intimate friends—Heena Panchal, Sanjay Bhavsar and Iliyas Master for their moral support.

My mother has remained the source of unconditional love and support. Her love and care, especially after the death of my father, has been enormous. I am also thankful to my sister, Sahida; my brother, Taufik; my sister-in-law, Rehana and their son, Alhaj for their emotional and moral support.

I wish to record my heartfelt gratitude towards my uncle Mohammadbhai and aunt Mahmudaben and their family (Mahebubhai, Zahid, Wahida) where I stayed during my undergraduate days; maternal uncle Sulemanbhai and aunt Abedaben where I stayed during my postgraduate days.

I owe special debt to my cousin, Kamrunisha; my brother-in-law, Makbulbhai and their loving family (Sameer-Suhana, Shirin-Asfaq, Aryan and Rayan). They provided me with love and hospitality during my stay in Baroda at different stages of this work. My son, Mahin has remained patient with my long absences from home during the last few months of this thesis. I owe a great deal more than he could fathom.

Finally, I thank my wife, Khatun for her emotional and moral support. She tolerated my chaotic life style. Without her active support it would not have been possible for me to pursue this research.
